LOCAL NON-PROFIT MANAGER STARTS WRITING VENTURE

Jeff Nash successfully climbed from an administrative coordinator to senior vice-president at Collaborative for Children, a non-profit dedicated to early education issues in the Houston area. After nearly 10 years at Collaborative, however, he has decided to go into business for himself as a writer. He formed Jeff Nash Writing Services in March of this year.

“Professionally, I have always considered myself a writer first and it was largely my writing ability that allowed me to succeed so well at Collaborative. Starting my own business will give me the flexibility to spend more time on my writing. When you see an opportunity to spend your days doing what you love, you have to take it,” explained Jeff Nash about why he started his own business.

“I believe that I have a lot to offer small businesses that want to focus on the rest of their business and not spend their day figuring out the right words for a brochure. Most people can write decently with enough time and editing. But small businesses frequently don’t have employees to spare for that long and shouldn’t have to settle for merely adequate quality,” Mr. Nash said in describing his new company.

Jeff Nash Writing Services provides writing and editing services for small businesses, particularly non-profit organizations. High quality text that is appropriate for the target audience can quickly be written for brochures, websites, grants, training materials, annual reports and other publications, allowing companies to focus on their core businesses.

Mr. Nash served in the United States Army from 1989 to 1992 when he received his honorable discharge. After the army, he studied at Sam Houston State University and received his Bachelor’s degree in Journalism in 1996. He worked as a features editor for an entertainment publication for 1 year before joining Collaborative in 1998. He also took courses at the University of Houston – Clear Lake on nights and weekends, receiving his MBA in 2003.
